This is going to sound a little weird, but I'm sorry I didn't cry at our wedding. I know you expected me to, and I know you read a lot in to that. I'm also sorry I didn't explain myself better. I was just so excited to be marrying you. And I should have told you how sweet and touching it was for me, that you did cry. I love that part of you.

It needs to be shared. I'm glad you shared with me. I've been doing a lot of thinking and praying today and I don't know how you feel about it, but I don't think Andrea or Shachar are going to be a good fit for what you need. I probably should have asked you first, but I called Kris to ask her opinion on specialties in relation to everything you've been through with the abuse and your parents and she actually recommends and IFS therapist.

Interesting. I will start looking into this and see if I can find somebody that I want to see. The problem is, when I'm sitting in counseling, all of those feelings don't come up. They only really come up when you and I are having a difficult conversation, and, something finally breaks through. So I don't know how to work on that in a session. Why do you think The other two therapists you mentioned are not right for me?

I think this is why those parts take turns: These sub-personalities consist of wounded parts and painful emotions such as anger (<https://www.psychologytoday.com/us/basics/anger>) and shame (<https://www.psychologytoday.com/us/basics/embarrassment>), and parts that try to control and protect the person from the pain of the wounded parts. The sub-personalities are often in conflict with each other and with one's core Self, a concept that describes the confident, compassionate, whole person that is at the core of every individual. IFS focuses on healing the wounded parts and restoring mental balance and harmony by changing the dynamics that create discord among the sub-personalities and the Self.

There are always going to be things that stay between you and me. I don't tell Toni as many specifics as you probably think. Protecting you is more important than venting. I think it's time for me to find a therapist. That was the other reason I called Kris. I need someone who isn't going to look at me like I'm crazy for working through all of this with you.

I wish you were here and I wish I wasn't leaving. I just feel really lost and scared. This feels a lot like five years ago as far as feeling so uncertain and everything makes me cry. I can feel you disconnected from me and I don't know how to get you back.

I'm not really disconnected as much as just embarrassed. And that does make me get quiet. I wish this could have all happened after roots tech. I know how excited you are to go and I really want you to be able to focus on that hobby that you love so much. This conversation can continue once you get back. I'm not going anywhere.

Well, for example, take Michelle Pope. I saw her at Miriam's wedding, and she and I exchanged information and every now and again I will text her to see how things are going with her. There's a doctor named Chelsea Marquard, who came out to my live, hands-on, implant course, and while she reaches out to ask questions about cases, and send x-rays to me and stuff to get my opinion, one time when I was talking to her about a case she was working on, I also asked her about her family and we chatted for a while about her kids.

You threw that out last night like it was one more thing about the gospel that you don't believe is gospel and don't believe is true. But this situation isn't about the gospel, it's about us. It's about your attitude, that you don't see anything wrong with it, so you're going to do it and it doesn't matter how I feel. That speaks more to your regard for my feelings than how you feel about church "rules". Talking to other women isn't necessarily what hurts me.

Mostly. Last night when you put that out there, you also said "that's a dealbreaker for you with our history". That implies that you knew it would make me uncomfortable. And it does, the idea that you're taking that risk after everything that we've been through in anyway it's scary for me and The idea that you would disregard how that would make me feel is hurtful.

I don't see anything wrong with asking a colleague about their family because you happen to be on the phone. That actually seems natural. It does bother me that you would initiate conversations with single women that don't seem to have any real purpose except to build a relationship.
